

The Dribble, Hoop & SWISH

Ninth grader Henry Ingraham and 10th grader Jackson Arnberg discuss their basketball careers.

At ages 3 and 6, basketball players Jackson Arnberg and Henry Ingraham respectively began their careers. Since the years have passed, each has experienced high and low moments. "In seventh grade, I was cut from my middle school team [at Falcon Cove Middle], which really

"This year the team is much better than last year when I played and we have a great core of players."

Sophomore Jackson Arnberg

motivated me to work harder on my game and become a better player so that next year I would make the team, which I did," Arnberg said.

Despite negativity, the boys were able to work past struggles and build goals from them. "Basketball has taught me to be confident and responsible. This year, so far I feel like I developed a lot more skills and confidence than in other years. I started playing basketball when I was younger because I would watch the NBA on television, and I aspired to be like them," Ingraham said.

While Ingraham looked up to NBA players such as James Harden and Allen Iverson, Arnberg started his basketball trek because of his older brother, Harrison Arnberg.

He has also found what makes him different on his team. "I try to model my moves after a lot of different players so I can work on my game all around. I think what separates me from other players is my versatility and ability to play any position," Arnberg said. Ingraham instead feels his athleticism and height makes him different from team members.

Arnberg's final thought depicted his most memorable game of the year for the JV team. "One of the best moments from this year was winning an away game at Westminster when we came in as an underdog," Arnberg said.

Near and Far

Highlights from the NSU Away Game

Seventh grader Jerry Dinkins prepares himself to intercept the ball. Although tricky, interceptions are necessary to move from defense to offense.

Eighth grader Hayden Stilphen practices free throws and two-pointers before the game. Practices enabled teams to familiarize themselves with new courts.

Seventh grader Hunter Tai Roberts uses his defensive skills to help the JH team block Nova from scoring. Defense was an integral part to winning games.

Photos: E. Gellman and B. Ramirez

Eighth grader Canaan Jumper shoots a three-pointer while her team cheers her on from the benches. Teammates were a source of encouragement for all games.

&

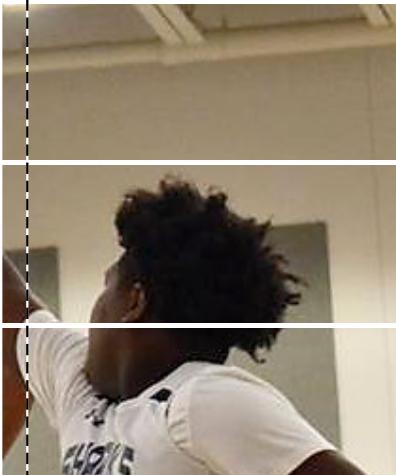

"The team worked pretty hard and showed up to practice. We formed a bond over time and became friends." Freshman John Eastep

"It was fun, you got to hang out with your friends and play the sport that we loved to play." Freshman Jonah Jacobs

"We did really good and I had a good time playing. Everyone understood that we need everyone to fully function." Freshman Stanley Pierre Eighth grader Miguel Cedeno and part of the JH basketball team watch the game while cheering. Players on the bench catch their breath after a long time on the court.

Eighth grader Michael McNally dribbles the ball toward his teammates. There were many different ways players could dribble ranging from a high dribble, low dribble and even over their head.

Eighth grader Solomon McFarlane and seventh grader Jerry Dinkins rush to retrieve the ball from a fallen "Shark". Both the opposing and home teams suffered many trips and falls through out the games. "I remember that one time I passed the ball to Bria Floyd and it hit her head. It was the first quarter, and everyone was laughing. Basketball isn't as serious as everyone thinks," eighth grader Maya Moise said.

Ways of the Win

John Wall

Photo: Slate.com

